

International Certificate in Intergenerational Learning

Who is this training for?

Anyone who wants to gain a deeper understanding of intergenerational work, its purpose, impact and practical application to enable them to apply this within their own work. This can include occupational therapists, childcare practitioners, primary and secondary teachers, classroom assistants, community learning & development and social care professionals, social workers, sociologists, psychologists, leisure & physical activity professionals, employment advisors, doctors, nurses and healthcare workers, librarians and third sector professionals of all backgrounds, amongst many others.

Length of course

The seven-week course takes 75 hours to complete. Students should look to spend an average of at least 10.5 hours per week working through the course materials.

Learning outcomes

On completion of this online training course students will:

- Understand what we mean by intergenerational practice and projects and what they can achieve.
- Understand the ways in which intergenerational practice and projects are of relevance in different contexts and situations and why they are so important in today's changing society.
- Understand how intergenerational practice and projects can contribute to more inclusive communities and workplaces.
- Understand and recognise the importance of monitoring and evaluating intergenerational projects.
- Understand some of the opportunities and issues, which can arise in monitoring and evaluating an intergenerational project.

Students will be able to:

- Recognise and put into practice the practical and theoretical understanding they have gained through the course in planning intergenerational projects and centres.
- Apply the standards of intergenerational work.
- Successfully create opportunities and overcome some of the challenges, which may arise bringing different generations together.
- Apply appropriate methods to monitor, measure and evaluate intergenerational projects.

Generations Working Together and the University of Granada, in partnership, deliver the course to students across Scotland. GWT is a Scottish Charitable Incorporated Organisation SC045851.
