International Diploma in Intergenerational Learning (IDIL)

Seven-week online training course

Generations Working Together and the University of Granada have partnered to develop the first global international diploma in intergenerational studies. This is a unique online course, where students are assigned an individual tutor who works with them one to one, along with a cohort to increase peer to peer learning.

The course is aimed at those either already working in intergenerational activities or beginning to develop their ideas. The course runs two times per calendar year, in April and October.

The course has trained over 100 professionals since 2018 from 12 countries and is accredited through the University of Granada's International School of Postgraduate Studies, Spain and the Continued Professional Development (CPD) Standards Office.

What previous students have said...

"The course provided a brilliant introduction to intergenerational learning and practice. It's challenged my thinking, widened my knowledge and introduced me to a wealth of resources to help develop my work in this area. I've enjoyed meeting others on the course and have really appreciated the individual feedback and support from my tutor."

"I found the course to be the most helpful piece of training. It had just the right amount of work to cover and it was not overly academic which means it is in plain English just like the nature of intergenerational work and practice in learning itself."

"I really enjoyed the course. It is very well structured; the reflection exercises are very good, and the material shared with us is very generous and rich in information. The tutors were present all the time and monitored the performance of the students."

A big thank you to the following projects and organisations for permission to use their photos from their intergenerational activities:
