Mair
Co-Director, community arts education organisation
Northern Ireland

As Co-Director of a non-profit community arts education organisation providing a range of arts opportunities in the local community, Mair is keen to build on the small intergenerational projects her organisation has started to develop.

The organisation engages with a variety of organisations - schools, community groups, nurseries and care homes - using arts-based activities to create accessible, creative opportunities for participants of different ages to engage with each other. They employ qualified artists for specific projects to ensure high quality experiences for those taking part.

Mair is looking for guidance on intergenerational practice and what it could look like in the work her organisation does. There is no-one locally developing intergenerational work so Mair joined Generations Working Together to access advice, hoping someone can signpost her to relevant resources and information. To add to her own qualifications, she is also interested in completing the International Certificate in Intergenerational Practice.

Judy
Charity Worker
USA

Judy is a support worker with a medium-sized charity that supports people living with dementia. She has a passion for working with seniors (older people) and is committed to improving the quality of life for those she supports.

As part of her job, Judy has become interested in intergenerational practice and how it can help bring different generations together to improve the lives of everyone involved. She attended several workshops on intergenerational practice and is now eager to learn more.

Judy is looking for ways to bring intergenerational practice into her work. She knows that joining Generations Working Together will give her the resources and knowledge she needs to be successful.
